I REMEMBER

On any given spring day, I always find myself thinking about those wonderful times back in Willow Bend, when I was thirteen and little Hector was only twelve and we used to play and slosh in the little mud pond behind our big old house. Mother would always be doing the spring cleaning and sometimes little Ethel from down the block would come over and give Mother a hand.

It's funny how I still call Ethel, little Ethel. She's grown up now, of course. She's married, has children and lives in New York City under a thick cloud of smog. Her life is ugly now, I guess. But it was beautiful once. She was about fourteen back then and she wore the same dress day after day after day. She was near-sighted and I still remember the funny way she always used to trip over little Emily who was always following her around. Of course, Emily is grown up now too and I think she's enrolled in a college out in California somewhere. Nobody trips over her anymore, but sometimes I wonder if she ever misses being tripped over. Ethel used to trip gracefully, and no more than once a day was little Emily every seriously injured.

Years later, while I was in boarding school out in Kansas, I tried to write an essay about the old mud pond, but I just couldn't do it. The memory was too painful. Even now the memory hurts.

But it's all so vivid. All those happy times. And the sad times too. Like the time Grandma got sick eating some of mother's jelly that wasn't preserved properly. Grandma used to love Mother's jelly. I remember one day she ate four whole jars of it. She never put it on bread, either, like most people do. Instead she used to take a spoon and scoop it out of the jar and put it in her mouth. And she used to sit there, hour after hour, eating jelly. Sometimes I thought she'd get sick just from the amount of jelly she ate but she never did. Of course now she doesn't eat jelly anymore, because she has since passed on, but back then she sure ate a lot.

It's strange how your memory plays tricks on you, funny little games that really aren't funny at all. Here I am, living in a penthouse. I have everything I need, everything I want, and a lot of things I don't want. Still I'd trade it all for a day back in the old mud pond, playing and sloshing and getting my shoes filled with mud. Mother used to yell at me for getting my shoes filled with mud. But it was never really me that she was angry with. It was life itself. I guess Mother never really liked living in the big old house with the little pond behind it. She had always wanted to be a circus star, and she might have been one if she hadn't been wounded in World War One.

But Father liked the big old house. It was his house. And it had been his father's house before him. And his father's father's house before his father. And his father's father's father's house before his father's father. And so on and so forth. It was his home, had always been his home and I don't think he would have been happy anywhere else. I know I have never really been happy anywhere else. Except possibly for those two weeks I spent in Trenton, while training for the olympics.

Last year, I took a trip back to Willow Bend. I was planning on visiting the old mud pond. I was going to stand there and look at it and think about little Hector and Ethel and Emily and Mother and Father and Grandma and Rosemarie Swartz who lived next door and always wore house slippers. And I thought I might even slosh in the mud and get my shoes filled with mud so I could maybe even be afraid that Mother was going to yell at me again.

But the mud pond wasn't there. It had been torn down and a billboard had been put up in its place. I can't remember exactly what the billboard said. But I've heard that they change it every month -- sometimes it's an advertisement for soup, sometimes an advertisement for automobiles, sometimes a public announcement about the flu. It's funny when you think about it. The billboard changes all the time, but the mud pond never used to change. It was a mud pond on Tuesday and it was a mud pond on Wednesday. And even a week or a month or a year later, it was still a mud pond. But now it's a billboard.

I thought for a while that I would write to Hector and tell him about the billboard, but I just couldn't do it. Hector's like me, in many ways. And I know how he'd feel. It's better to just let him think that the old mud pond is still there.

I did write to little Emily though. I thought she'd like to know. It was about a week ago that I wrote and it was a long letter, type-written, three pages, single spaced. I didn't know Emily's address so I sent it in care of Ethel. And she must have sent it on.

Today, I got a post card from Emily. She said it was nice to hear from me and she promised never to forget her old friends no matter how big she got. But she didn't mention the mud pond. I thought that was strange. I thought for sure she would mention the mud pond. I wonder why she didn't. Has she so soon forgotten what the mud pond meant?
